Predict Brilliant Social Season at the Capital

Mrs. Harding's Recovery Encourages Washington Hostesses to Entertain More

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3.—The past week has been an active one in social circles in Washington, and there is every indication of a brilliant period from now on to the opening of the new year. While Mrs. Harding will not resume White House entertainments or any social activity this winter, the committee to improve the social season has been given encouragement to entertain by other hostesses in the official set.

The Congressional Club will entertain frequently through the season, starting with a tea Friday, December 8, when the usual feature of entertainment will be omitted, giving members all the more time for greeting one another. The committee on entertainment is preparing a well balanced program, and the first large private dance to be given will be that in the last week of December, with Representative and Mrs. Campbell as hosts, and their debutante daughter, Miss Helen Campbell, as guest of honor.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, one of the most gracious hostesses in official Washington, will take the place of Mrs. Lenox as president of the club.

Delegates from the Central American republics invited to Washington for conference by the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, meet to-morrow, and with due care for the love of hospitality in the countries represented by the delegates, Mr. and Mrs. Hughes will hold a reception to-morrow evening in the Pan-American Union Building.

Young Boswell Interviews Jeritza

BECAUSE she is the popular prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera, she created a storm of roles in Vienna, she is the Baroness Popper, she sings brilliantly and is beautiful. Young Boswell walked noiselessly down the corridor, not to disturb MME. JERITZA's practice. He stood outside the door of her dressing room until she had finished. She was doing "Lohengrin," the opera in which she made her debut at the Royal Opera in Vienna.

She was like some one enchanted as she climbed to heights that dazzled, and dropped again to softer notes and then stopped. He was suddenly afraid to push the bell. He knew he would be overheard to meet a woman whose voice could do such magical work.

MME. JERITZA—I am sorry if I kept you waiting, but I always practice at this hour and then from 12 until 2 I go to the studio and work there. Young Boswell—Of course, I must ask you if you like America.

MME. JERITZA—Oh, I do like America. Everywhere I have been, and outside New York I've been only to Philadelphia and Brooklyn—she laughed and threw up her hands as though she had already "caught on" to our geographical wheeze about the city across the East River—but I like it every bit. I want to see all of America. Next summer we are going to take a place in the country, and I want to have horses.

Young Boswell—You ride? MME. JERITZA—Oh, no! I am afraid to ride, but I want horses to drive. I like them better than automobiles. And we want to travel about and see your country.

Young Boswell's eyes were attracted by a glowing portrait over the piano. MME. JERITZA is a blonde, white hair, with a strand of pearls falling to her waist, against a background of confused blue and gray. Her gaze was drawn to the blue eyes, upturned, expressing tremendous reality and enthusiasm, and her blue hair curled about her head.

MME. JERITZA—That is my new picture. Halmi painted it. I like it because it is so simple. And you must see my new photographs for Thais.

She took down a stack of pictures, and while Young Boswell browsed through them admiring her costumes and poses she continued to speak to her, where her companion sat patiently turning over the pages of the score.

Young Boswell—Have you a favorite opera, as all singers in novels have? MME. JERITZA—I have no favorite anything. I like to sing all of my roles.

Young Boswell could not keep his eyes off the portrait. "Wonder," he thought, "if all great people with great talents are like this, simple and filled with enthusiasm over their work." As he ran through measure after measure of the score, allowing Young Boswell the pleasure of seeing a new, radiant, and dispassionate of the stage and the discomfort of a gallery chair, he began to understand what a true artist is. Great simplicity is the secret.

MME. JERITZA—I am sorry you must go. I hope you will come again some day. I am not sure I want to talk more about seeing America.

Again she shook Young Boswell's hand heartily, and, like a young girl fascinated with some new pleasure, she returned to her practice, as enthusiastic as though she were preparing for her debut. Then Young Boswell realized why the men and women paid to stand up at the opera just to hear her sing, why she had been a favorite in Vienna, why she had been applauded all over Europe wherever she appeared, why America was a fortunate country to have her here.

To Ask 15 Millions For Development of State Park System

Legislative Appropriation Is Urged by Committee to Meet Recreational Needs of Increasing Population

The 1923 Legislature will be asked to appropriate $15,000,000 for the extension of the state park system and the improvement of existing parks and forest preserves by a committee of the New York State Association, which, in a report just made public, announces a plan for a comprehensive park system covering all sections of the state.

The report points out that the $10,000,000 voted in 1916 for the Interstate Park and Forest Preserve lands has been almost exhausted, and that the needs of these two developments alone will require over $9,000,000 during the next few years. It therefore recommends that $15,000,000 be appropriated, subject to referendum at the next election, so that the Interstate Park and Forest Preserve may be fully utilized and a sufficient balance be made available for carrying out a state-wide program.

Such an appropriation, according to the report, would make it possible to provide recreational facilities for sections of the state neglected in previous bond issues and would provide for the inauguration of a unified state park plan to take into account the anticipated growth of the state's population. Estimates made by a telephone company forecast a population of 12,000,000 in 1930 and 14,000,000 in 1940, the increase to occur mainly in the cities. In particular the committee points out that the western part of the state has not been provided with recreational facilities, and that within the metropolitan area the opportunity to connect and extend park facilities must be seized now if at all.

It recommends the following distribution of the fund:

For the State Forest Preserve	$3,000,000
For the Palisades Interstate Park	2,500,000
For the Adirondack Park	2,000,000
For the Niagara State Park	1,500,000
For the Westchester State Park	1,000,000
For the Watkins Glen and Knappa Falls parks and for other parks and preserves in the Finger Lakes region	250,000
For parkway connections between the Finger Lakes and the Adirondack Park	1,000,000
For the extension and development of the Adirondack Park	1,000,000
For a parkway connection between the Adirondack Park and the Catskill Park	1,000,000
For the development and extension of other state parks and the acquisition and development of additional parks, in the Catskill region and development of the State Reservation at Saratoga Springs and the John Boyd Thacher Park	750,000
Total	$15,000,000
